Restated thesis statement

In the end, the critic Philo M. Blake, Jr.'s opinion of London's protagonists is not justified pertaining to the novel The Call of the Wild. First, Buck shows commitment and love—two noble qualities of a hero—to his master when Buck succeeds in pulling an immense load to win Thornton's bet. Buck also shows heroism by courageously risking his own life when he saves Thornton after being flung into rapid water. Lastly, he demonstrates hero characteristics and leadership when he perseveres to lead a dog team across the Yukon. Despite rejecting the traditions of civilization, which happen to be a liability in the hostile Northland, the character of Buck perfectly reflects the characteristics of a hero through his courage, outstanding achievements, and noble qualities, even if he isn't "pretty and perfect."
